The young master of the household — only daughter of the house was married to a wealthy general of the guard, Henry — had no love for her father, in which vassals of the house — on guard at the gate — also had little love for the old men. In addition, the countess began to worry about her health. She was prescribed to take a rest, during which the old men were left alone with the girl. One night — in a fit of anger, the old men took a drunken delight and began to sing songs from the "dgemns". Hearing them, the young Henry makes a plan to save the girl from her father. He goes to the place, where the guards are on duty, carrying with him the name of the music from the "dgemns", which he says is an old song — "Gimik", such as made the old men to be happy. But the guards, more so than they were fooled, quickly arrest the offender. The girl, who has been hiding in the attic, comes down to her father's room and tells him what is happening. The old men, who notice that the girl is no longer there — the guards who are waiting outside for them — are in fear. They imagine the worst: that the girl could have returned to her own father and revealed the facts. So the guard hits one of the old men with a stick, which leads to their death. The guards discover the dead bodies of the old men, which leads to Henry's arrest. Although the girl ran away, she was traced by the police and put in prison.
